

This analogy can be used for any team sport but for this instance I am going to use football. Every football team has an offensive side and a defensive side (function(s)). The playbook for both sides is similar to function declaration and has a list of plays a coach can call (function names). Each play in the book has formations that can be tweaked slightly to look like a different play or the original play (parameters). When the offensive coach decides to call a run play in a usually pass-first formation the run play is a function, and the pass-first formation is the argument. The offense will perform the play to the best of their ability and at least gain yards or get a touchdown (return values). The opposing defense goes through a similar chain of events to attempt to stop the opposing offense from scoring or gaining yards and this back and forth continues throughout the game.
